The man had been driving for a long time, and it showed. His sweat-stained crumpled shirt resembled nothing like the crisp starched Egyptian cotton shirt he had put on at sunrise. With the car windows closed, the cabin air was quite stuffy. The sweat that slowly rolled down the side of his face through his day old beard scrabble and onto his shirt made the drive that much more uncomfortable.

He was oblivious of the pleasant desert night just outside his driver-side window. The idea of rolling down the window and enjoying the desert night air did not make the queue of conscious thought, for his random memories were tormenting him. Like a student unprepared for a test, the events of a terrible day were replaying in his mind and a conscious remedy was eluding him. Being uncomfortable was just part of the script.
