Excerpt from The Works of Thomas Jackson, D. D, Vol. 3 of 12: Sometime President of Corpus Christ College, Oxford, and Dean of Peterborough

And this advantage these present comments, otherwise weak, have of more accurate labours directed to the same end they are: these, as they discover the danger of many encumbrances which usually beset the way of life to be much greater than it is ordinarily thought, so they give intimations withal of means more immediate and effectual for their avoidance; inasmuch as they derive, as well our alacrity in all good performances, as all preservatives against wicked practices, (more directly and more necessarily than commonly a man shall find their derivance,) from the essence or internal constitution of such faith as they describe. That I handle not these points so accurately as I myself could wish, much less so exactly as a judicious reader would require, the best apology I can make must be borrowed from that I have already made for the unripeness of my first-fruits, published, upon the same occasion these are, before their time. Others besides myself have taken notice of your honourable favours and kindness towards me; and secret consciousness how slow I am in private testifications of my duty, either by my pen or presence, hastened the conception of this more public and durable pledge.
